

Half-Breed Scars That Don't Heal: A Journey of Identity, Trauma, and Resilience

In this powerful and moving memoir, Angela Two Moons tells the story of her life as a half-breed woman in the American West. Born to a Native American mother and a white father, Two Moons was raised in a world where she never quite fit in. She was too Indian for the white world, and too white for the Indian world. As a result, she spent her life feeling like an outsider, struggling to find her place.

Two Moons's memoir is a raw and honest account of the challenges she faced growing up half-breed. She writes about the racism she experienced from both whites and Indians, the poverty she lived in, and the abuse she suffered at the hands of her stepfather. But Two Moons's story is also one of hope and resilience. She writes about the strength she found in her culture, her family, and her own spirit. She writes about the ways she learned to heal the scars of her past and to find peace within herself.
