

The Bold American Journalists Who Brought the World Home Between the Wars

By the early 1900s, the United States was a growing world power. But for many Americans, the world beyond their borders was a mystery. That began to change with the rise of a new breed of American journalists who risked their lives to bring the world home to America.

These journalists were not content to stay at home and write about events from afar. They wanted to see the world for themselves, to experience the events that were shaping history firsthand. They were often the first to report on major events, and their work helped to shape the way Americans understood the world.

One of the most famous of these journalists was Martha Gellhorn. Gellhorn was a pioneering war correspondent who covered some of the most important conflicts of the 20th century. She was the first woman to cover a major war from the front lines, and her work helped to change the way Americans thought about war and women.

Another famous journalist of this era was Vincent Sheean. Sheean was a Pulitzer Prize-winning journalist who covered the Russian Revolution, the Spanish Civil War, and World War II. He was a close friend of Ernest Hemingway, and his work helped to introduce Hemingway to the world.

The Challenges of Foreign Correspondence

Despite the challenges, these journalists were committed to bringing the world home to America. They believed that Americans needed to understand the world around them, and they were willing to risk their lives to make that happen.
