Macbeth contemplates whether he can perform the dastardly deed of killing King Duncan. He is trying to build up the courage but cannot seem to do it. He says he must not do it, because it would bring him bad luck.

Macbeth reveals a whole series of conflicting thoughts and feelings by talking aloud to the audience. This is called a soliloquy.

Macbeth tries to overthink his action to justify his intent to commit murder from one of the following ways by justifying, accepting and supporting it in his mind.

ACT 1, SCENE 7: Macbeth's soliloquy

Macbeth and his wife, Lady Macbeth, have just killed King Duncan and taken over the throne. They are now King and Queen.

MACBETH: If—
If I do this,
It will be思想; it is unnatural
To kill the innocent and trust in God for salvation—that butchers men ought not to touch and the world's best
But have spent life's breath instead of time.
What's done is done. But in these lines,
We still have judgment here that we have much
Bloody instruction, which being taught, vexes
To plague the mind. The even-handed scales
Commend the ingenuous of our presence
To our more base, thicker kind of men.
False, such is man's nature, though grace
Hath given us better qualities. Besides, my thane
With honest friends, honest servants, true friends,
Yea, those of his great virtue, that the virtues
Will stand like mighty, unspotted jades against
The gross somberities of life taking off;
And yet, like a patient jaded goat
Leaving the flock, to Misen's caverns, turned Down the impious steep of life,
Shall leave the flocks and fattery there,
That have not chosen the road. I have but one
To pick the blemish of my coat, but here
Nothing amiss, though wrinkles many
And folds in themselves.

Enter Lady Macbeth
She comes in and speaks to Macbeth.

Annotations

Macbeth says that he needs to accept his iniquitous ways.

Macbeth's soliloquy
Shows the inner of Duncan's murderer, along with the mechanics, he imagines that the King has done a lot for him and that he should be very grateful. Macbeth mistakes Duncan's love for Macbeth for King Duncan. Little does he suspect of the king's death for a royal hunting in Birnam Wood, he should protect King Duncan from his angry subjects in Birnam Wood.

LADY MACBETH: King Duncan has done a very good King and that his honour would deserve not to be justified in the eyes of the heavens. The very act is God's planning, without question.
