Join us as we delve into this fascinating chapter of history and uncover the hidden stories of the forgotten war.

The Epic March: A Journey of Endurance and Determination

In 1942, as the Japanese forces advanced through the Pacific, a small group of Australian soldiers embarked on an epic march through the uncharted and unforgiving jungles of New Guinea. Their mission was to establish a base camp and gather intelligence on the enemy's movements.

Led by Lieutenant Colonel John Scanlon, the 2/14th Battalion faced relentless rain, disease, and starvation. They navigated treacherous terrain, hacked through thick vegetation, and crossed swollen rivers. Each step was a testament to their indomitable spirit and unwavering determination.

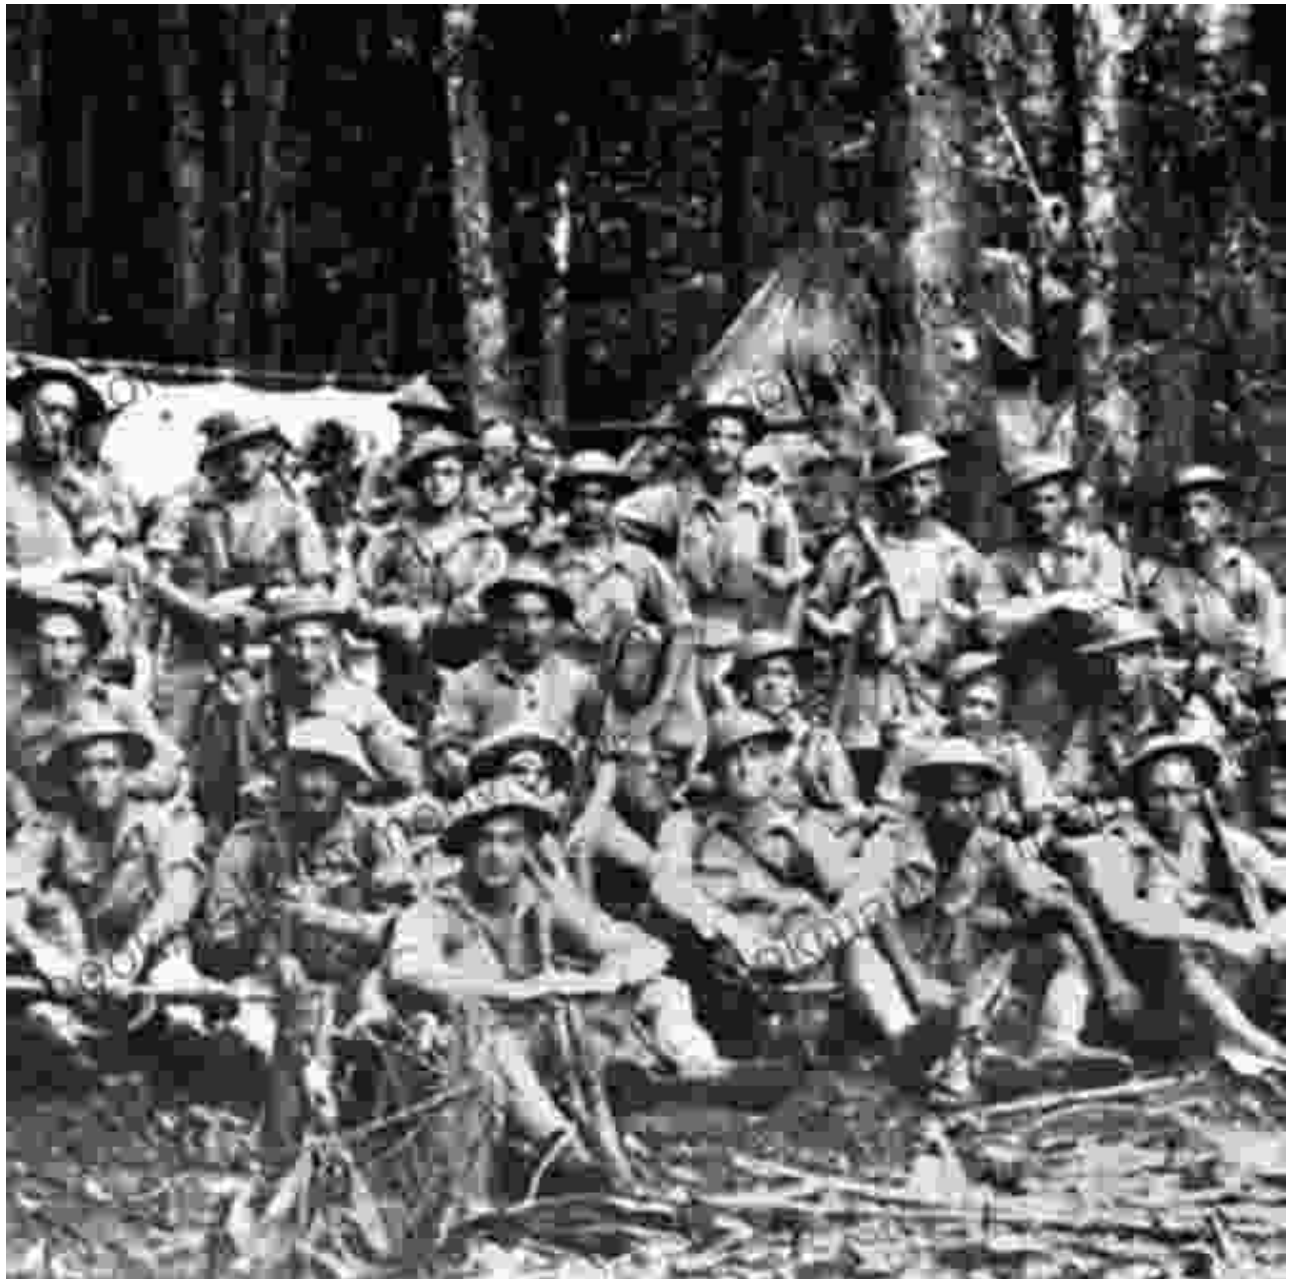

The Terrifying Battle: The Fight for Ioribaiwa Ridge

After months of arduous marching, the soldiers of the 2/14th Battalion reached their destination: Ioribaiwa Ridge. They quickly realized that they were vastly outnumbered by the Japanese forces occupying the ridge.

On January 2, 1943, the battle for Ioribaiwa Ridge commenced. The fighting was intense and brutal. The Australians, despite their numerical disadvantage, fought with unwavering courage and determination. They charged against Japanese machine guns, engaged in hand-to-hand combat, and refused to give up.
